During the pandemic, we learned that family, friends, and neighbors work together to create a crisis. Rohini Nilekani

Rohini Nilekani, the chairperson of SBI Group, has been responsible for much of the good that has happened in education in India. She says the pandemic has taught us that we can't depend on the government alone to solve problems. We need people to step forward and do their part. Nilekani is known for her work in strategic philanthropy, which is different from charity because humans continue to work on the problem. She believes that it is important to look at societal thinking and think about how to make a difference.

Her book, Samaaj, Sarkaar, Bazaar: A Citizen-First Approach, is a collection of over a thousand articles and blog posts. It has been written by a large group of thinkers and activists, and it is intended to be a hub for thinkers, writers, and researchers.

Nilekani talks about the importance of reading for children and the need to prepare for future crises. She says that the current system is not ready to face a crisis. She is also interested in the role of women in society and the need for them to use their talents both in their jobs and in their homes. She believes that women need to be more involved in civil society.

Nilekani is also interested in the role of online and offline civil society. She says that there are many processes and pathways that can be created for citizens to come together and help each other. She believes that this is a way for people to feel good about themselves and make a difference.

On the other hand, Nilekani is also concerned about clicktivism and the idea that it can replace real action. She believes that online and offline civil society work together to help solve problems. She says that it is important to look at the root cause of a problem and see if it can be solved.

Nilekani is also interested in the role of invisible voluntary action in India. She believes that we can galvanize more people to help solve problems.

Her book, The Hungry Little Sky Monster, has been published by Juggernaut. It is a collection of short stories about children and their struggles. Nilekani is involved in strategic philanthropy and volunteerism. She also supports organizations that bring in water, roads, and infrastructure for the vulnerable.

Her book, Samaaj, Sarkaar, Bazaar: A Citizen-First Approach, has been written by a large group of thinkers and activists, and it is intended to be a hub for thinkers, writers, and researchers.
